Donald Halstead is Instructor and Director of Writing Programs at Harvard School of Public Health and a leader in the teaching of writing in public health education. His courses address the principles for writing with clarity, concision, precision and style; emphasize critical analysis and evidence-based argumentation; and use collaborative learning and peer review as means for clarifying language and thought. He works with students, postdocs, and faculty from all the school's disciplines in the population, mathematical, and biological sciences. His work with doctoral students includes leading the Dissertation Writing Seminar, which has met every week for 14 years to review members' draft dissertation studies.
